A start-up now named PhoneTell has launched a free smartphone application that gives users contact information about who is calling while letting them respond to the caller with a custom voice or SMS text message if they can't pick up the phone.

Now downloadable from the Android Market for Droids and other Android phones, the app will also be available for Apple's iPhones in about another month and for RIM BlackBerry phones six weeks from now, said PhoneTell CEO Steve Larsen, in an interview. "Microsoft's Windows Phone 7 is not on our roadmap just yet," he added.

Officially introduced this week at the TechCrunch Disrupt conference in New York City, the app was first shown at last year's FallDemo show, back when PhoneTell was known as CallSpark.

More than Just the Number

The new PhoneTell app can give users much more info about callers than just their phone numbers. The app works in conjunction with a cloud-based search service, also available for free from PhoneTell, which can deliver a caller's name, e-mail address, and snailmail address, for example, if PhoneTell is able to find this data.
